the 1990s, the number of people in the UK who are employed in the public sector has increased by 1.5 million (from 2.5 million in 1980 to 4 million in 1998). The number of people in the public sector who are employed in the health sector has increased by 1.2 million (from 1.2 million in 1980 to 2.4 million in 1998).

There is a growing emphasis on the need to improve the quality of care provided by the public sector. This has led to a number of initiatives, including the introduction of the Health Service Act 1990, the Health Service Act 1997, and the Health Service Act 2001. These initiatives have led to a number of changes in the way the public sector is run, including the introduction of competition, the introduction of a new governance structure, and the introduction of a new funding system.

The Health Service Act 1990 introduced a number of changes to the way the public sector is run. It introduced competition, which means that the public sector is now able to compete with the private sector for contracts. It also introduced a new governance structure, which means that the public sector is now able to make decisions more quickly and more effectively. Finally, it introduced a new funding system, which means that the public sector is now able to raise money more easily.

The Health Service Act 1997 introduced a number of changes to the way the public sector is run. It introduced a new governance structure, which means that the public sector is now able to make decisions more quickly and more effectively. It also introduced a new funding system, which means that the public sector is now able to raise money more easily.

The Health Service Act 2001 introduced a number of changes to the way the public sector is run.
