There is a growing awareness of the need to develop strategies to meet the needs of the ageing population. The Department of Health (1999) has published a strategy for ageing, which sets out the government's commitment to improve the lives of older people. The strategy is based on three main principles: (1) to ensure that older people are able to live independently and actively; (2) to ensure that older people are able to access the services and support they need; and (3) to ensure that older people are able to participate in the decisions that affect their lives.

The strategy is based on the following assumptions: (1) that older people are a diverse group with different needs and interests; (2) that older people are able to live independently and actively; (3) that older people are able to access the services and support they need; and (4) that older people are able to participate in the decisions that affect their lives. The strategy is based on the following principles: (1) to ensure that older people are able to live independently and actively; (2) to ensure that older people are able to access the services and support they need; and (3) to ensure that older people are able to participate in the decisions that affect their lives.

the 1990s, the number of people in the world who are under 15 years of age has increased from 1.1 billion to 1.5 billion. This increase is due to a combination of factors, including a decline in infant mortality rates, a rise in life expectancy, and a high birth rate in many developing countries.

The increase in the number of children in the world has led to a corresponding increase in the number of children in the workforce. In many developing countries, children are often employed in hazardous and exploitative conditions, such as in the mining, agriculture, and manufacturing sectors.

The increase in the number of children in the workforce has led to a corresponding increase in the number of children who are out of school. In many developing countries, children are often forced to work in order to support their families, and this often results in them missing out on their education.

The increase in the number of children in the workforce and out of school has led to a corresponding increase in the number of children who are at risk of poverty and social exclusion. In many developing countries, children who are out of school and working are often at risk of being exploited and abused.
