the 1990s, the number of people in the UK who are aged 65 and over has increased by 1.5 million, and the number of people aged 75 and over has increased by 1 million (Office of National Statistics 1999). The number of people aged 85 and over is projected to increase by 1.5 million by the year 2020 (Office of National Statistics 1999).

There is a growing awareness of the need to develop services to meet the needs of the ageing population. The Department of Health (1999) has published a strategy for ageing, which sets out the government's commitment to improve the lives of older people. The strategy is based on three main principles: (1) to ensure that older people have the opportunity to live independently and actively; (2) to ensure that older people have access to the services and support they need; and (3) to ensure that older people are treated with respect and dignity.

The strategy is based on the following assumptions: (1) that older people are a diverse group with different needs and interests; (2) that older people should be able to live independently and actively; (3) that older people should have access to the services and support they need; and (4) that older people should be treated with respect and dignity. The strategy sets out a range of measures to be taken to improve the lives of older people, including: (1) to improve the physical environment; (2) to improve the social environment; (3) to improve the financial environment; and (4) to improve the health and social care environment.

There is a growing awareness of the need to address the health care needs of the ageing population. The Department of Health (2000) has identified the need to develop a 'new paradigm' of health care for the ageing population, one that is based on a 'person-centred' approach, rather than the 'disease-centred' approach that has been the traditional focus of health care.

The 'person-centred' approach to health care is based on the principle that the individual is the focus of care, rather than the disease. This approach recognizes that the individual's health and well-being are influenced by a range of factors, including their physical, mental, and social health.
